Damodar Ashtakam in Malayalam PDF 1,63 Mb download fileFDG-PET and CT in patients with mucinous cystic neoplasm and its malignant counterparts in the pancreas. The optimal management of mucinous cystic neoplasms of the pancreas is controversial due to its histologic features. It is difficult to distinguish mucinous cystic neoplasm from mucinous cystic carcinoma (MCC) preoperatively, partly because of their similarities in histopathologic features. This study investigates the usefulness of PET in discriminating between these entities. Subjects were 19 patients (10 men, 9 women; mean age, 62.0 years; range, 34-84 years) with mucinous cystic neoplasm (n = 5), mucinous cystic carcinoma (n = 12), or invasive ductal adenocarcinoma of the pancreas (n = 2). FDG-PET and CT images were reviewed to evaluate their accuracy for diagnosing mucinous cystic neoplasm, MCC, or ductal adenocarcinoma. The findings of FDG-PET were statistically compared with those of pathology of resected specimens and CT. A positive imaging result for mucinous cystic neoplasm (n = 5) showed no accumulation of FDG, whereas a positive result for MCC (n = 12) showed intense accumulation. The two mucinous cystic neoplasm patients with an invasive ductal adenocarcinoma component also showed positive results on FDG-PET. CT was also helpful to distinguish mucinous cystic neoplasm from MCC and ductal adenocarcinoma. Mucinous cystic neoplasms with abundant mucin contained more FDG accumulation than did low-grade MCC, whereas low-grade MCC showed more intense accumulation than did high-grade MCC. Histopathologic findings of resected specimens were consistent with imaging and CT results. PET of mucinous cystic neoplasms may be helpful in the diagnosis of mucinous cystic neoplasms, including mucinous cystic carcinomas. FDG-PET may be superior to CT for the evaluation of
